Abstract

The issue of poverty which lie in many strata's of society has been a concern for both people and the state for long. To combat poverty and ensure development India has been implementing its development schemes since the independence. In this regard, India achieved a good result but this is not news of comfort. Even after more than 67 years of independence, India is one of the countries which have a large number of poor people. The successfulness of poverty alleviation programmes depends on the participation of people in those programmes. Women are the half of the total population of the country. That is why they have also the responsibility to actively participate in these programmes and help the country to ensure development. This paper tries to study the participation of women in various poverty alleviation programs.

I am a woman

Whose hands have been lacerated?

By the sharp daggers of pain

Whose body has been broken

By your endless, humiliating, grinding toil

Whose skin is a veritable desert

And whose hair smell
